Although many advances have been made in the understanding of the immune system, the true complexity of immunity has not been fully appreciated. As a result, numerous studies have examined the immuno-modulatory potential of dietary, environmental, and commensal-derived factors on the host immune response. Current studies have determined that the intestinal lumen harbors numerous factors that function to regulate the immune system. Here, we review recent studies that have focused on immunomodulation by the enteric microbiota and dietary compounds and propose a model to provide an explanation for the complexity of the gut-liver-immune axis. Topical medications for the treatment of breast hyperhidrosis. Many different medications, such as topical and oral treatments, have been used to treat breast hyperhidrosis (BH). The aim of this systematic review was to evaluate the evidence for the use of topical medications for the treatment of BH. This review was undertaken according to the guidelines of the Cochrane Collaboration and the Preferred Reporting Items for Systematic Reviews and Meta-analyses (PRISMA). This review, which included randomized and non-randomized trials, included any topical medication used to treat BH. The primary outcome measures were the differences in the efficacy between the intervention and the control condition. Of the 539 potentially relevant articles that were identified, 49 relevant articles were finally included in the review. Studies reviewed included various medications, including botulinum toxin type A (BTA), imiquimod (IMQ), and glyceryl trinitrate (GTN). The size of the study ranged from 3 to 74. The type of control group included placebo or saline. Among the studies reviewed, there was no difference in the efficacy of the various topical medications. Based on the available evidence, the efficacy of the topical medications, BTA, IMQ, and GTN 6d1f23a050
