Fairbank Á La Sorci Egrave Re Jules Michelet Á Organometallic Chemistry Ian J S FairlambÁ Pectic polysaccharides are associated with a number of benefits to the foods they are derived from. As the backbone of the plant cell wall, pectin is a water-soluble component having a wide array of industrial and commercial applications. In cereal grain-based products such as bread, for example, soluble dietary fibre is often provided by pectins. Insoluble dietary fibre is also provided by a number of pectic polysaccharides that may be derived from pectin, including cellulose, hemicellulose and pectic oligosaccharides. As a result, pectin-derived products are used to improve food texture and reduce digesta viscosity. The native pectic polysaccharides of plant cells are also highly complex in structure and may contain several different polysaccharides with different degrees of esterification. Pectin from plants consists of a backbone of α -(1→4)-linked residues of D-galacturonic acid (or L-rhamnose and L-arabinose) to
