"Do they have any concepts at all? Any values?" When the elections began last month, Trump pronounced himself a "big fan" of Russian President Vladimir Putin and called him "fine." The president's critics, including some in his own party, see it as a confounding contradiction and a slap in the face for the United States. "If there were an award for continuity, that man would take the award for sure," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., declared last month. But Trump's allies say the problem isn't his affinity for Putin, but the fact that Trump's inexperience is creating a leader who is naive and unpredictable. Trump, they say, has no agenda and no ability to understand how policy is made. His aides report that he doesn't really read briefing materials or the news, and relies instead on a hodgepodge of papers held together by Scotch tape. "He has no discipline," New York Post columnist Michael Goodwin said. "He has no ability to really understand what's going on in the world or make a decision." In part, his lack of interest in detail extends to his Cabinet nominees, for whom he is demanding loyalty over expertise and experience. Trump's U.N. ambassador, Nikki Haley, told a news conference last week that she had never discussed climate change and clean energy with him. The question now: Which is
