A new method for planning and producing ventral hernia repairs: pilot study of experience with the (breastfed) panniculus postpartum. The incidence of ventral hernia is high in the first 2 years postpartum. We hypothesized that the panniculus, because of the shape of its sac, could be used as a flap in ventral hernia repair. The panniculus is a large fold of subcutaneous fatty tissue that encases the rectus muscle fascia, and its shape, together with the shape of the visceral surface of the rectus muscle, allows it to cover a wide surface and be shaped to fit the area involved. The authors reported on their experience using the panniculus in ventral hernia repair. The panniculus was harvested through an inframammary skin crease incision, folded into a triangulated rectangle, and sewn to a well-vascularized area to cover a muscle defect (3-5 cm in diameter and 2-3 cm in depth). The panniculus was harvested through an inframammary skin crease incision, folded into a triangulated rectangle, and sewn to a well-vascularized area to cover a muscle defect (3-5 cm in diameter and 2-3 cm in depth). Then, the panniculus was placed on top of the muscle defect and sutured to the fascia in layers and the skin in layers. The authors performed this procedure in 37 cases (20 consecutive cases of recurrent incisional hernias, 12 postbariatric surgery hernias, and 5 concomitant appendicectomy-related ventral hernias). Median follow-up was 13 months (range: 4-32 months). Follow-up included physical examination, abdominal computed tomography, and tristimulus colorimetry to measure the scar size. The mean size of the defect covered by the panniculus was 4.6 cm² (SD: 2.2 cm²). At follow-up, the mean scar size was 5.5 cm² (SD: 3.0 cm²). Postoperatively, 24 (68.6%) patients were completely asymptomatic and did not require adjunctive therapy. Three (8 6d1f23a050
