care setting? To describe the extent to which primary care practitioners are aware of and manage children's dental pain. A postal questionnaire survey was carried out in January to March 2006. National postal addresses were obtained from the Department of Health's National Primary Care Resource Unit. Primary care practitioners were asked to rate (using a linear visual analogue scale) their level of knowledge of children's oral health and their pain management skills. Three hundred and forty-two questionnaires were returned. Only 5% of the sample felt that their knowledge was good. A further 77% felt that their pain management skills were poor. The majority of dental practitioners reported that they felt their pain management skills were poor, even though they claimed to have some teaching in this area. Children are highly likely to suffer from dental pain and this is under-managed in primary care. This survey suggests that a significant number of children with dental pain are referred to secondary care despite the fact that primary care is ideally placed to diagnose, refer and manage dental pain.(ANSA) - Rome, June 16 - The Central Council of Italian Catholics said on Thursday that "recomposition" of the church in Italy is impossible, advocating instead a "process of introspection". "We have to ask not for reconstitution but for introspection," said Ilaria Costa, the council's vice-president. "Not for us, for Italians, would it be possible to rebuild again the church that was in the Italian peninsula",
