Hand-held applicators such as syringes, pen needles, and the like are commonly used for administering a medical fluid or agent to a patient. In many cases a practitioner holds the hand-held applicator by hand while administering a medical fluid or agent into a patient's body. The hand-held applicator is typically constructed so that a needle is protruded from the applicator with the needle extending into a medical solution or agent. In use, the practitioner usually applies force to the applicator in a manner which would cause the needle to puncture the skin of the patient. After administering the medical solution or agent to the patient, there is the potential for the needle of the applicator to be contaminated with the bodily fluids from the patient. Therefore, the needle of the applicator should be retracted into the body of the applicator after use to avoid exposing the practitioner to the bodily fluids of the patient. In other instances, the hand-held applicator is used for suctioning fluids from a patient. In this situation, the practitioner may hold the hand-held applicator by hand while applying negative pressure to a syringe or catheter attached to the applicator. The practitioner would then depress the plunger rod in the syringe to cause a negative pressure to be applied to a region of the body of the patient. There are several examples in the prior art of hand-held applicators with retractable needles. A typical hand-held applicator is a syringe having a barrel, plunger, and needle. The needle is extended into the distal end of the syringe barrel. The plunger is attached to the syringe
